
Key Issues for NZ UPR 2018 Review

1. Issue: New Zealand's criminal justice system exacerbates the systemic plight of Māori.

Recommendations:

1. Legislation implementing a requirement for all Māori at all stages of the criminal justice system to have access to culturally appropriate rehabilitation, including at all three pre-arrest, pre-charge and post-charge warning stages.
2. Legislation diverting Māori convicted of non-serious charges (with maximum penalties of less than 10 years imprisonment) to a Tikanga Māori-based rehabilitation system.
3. Introduce into the Sentencing Act 2002 & Corrections Act 2004 a mandatory process of Māori cultural input at sentencing, and at every stage after sentencing.
4. Stipulate mandatory Māori (and other) cultural understanding to a requisite minimum level for all judicial and legal officers in the criminal justice system.
5. Appoint an interim "emergency" human rights commissioner to investigate why previous UPR recommendations have not been implemented to any effective degree and identify the most critical areas of human rights gaps presently across Police, Orange Tamariki and Corrections.

Comment:

The plight of Māori in the criminal justice system — and their inability to do anything meaningful about it without clear and specific legislation — remains largely unabated. This is confirmed virtually every day across hundreds of cases where judges, primarily in the District Court, have been failed by archaic legislation and often find themselves having to work around it in order to provide any substantive progressive treatment of Māori. Lawyers are failed in being devoid of virtually no legislative tools or guidance to rely on. Individual practitioner or judge awareness of criminal justice issues and the resource to expend — and creativity required — to provide exceptional options to courts, is a combination of factors not often present on any given day in the courts.

2. Issue: Māori (and other ethnic group) access to community advocacy:

Recommendations:

1. Introduce scheme for trained community advocates to be accessible to Māori and ethnic groups in order to engage with UN Civil Society objectives.
2. Facilitate Māori (and other communities similarly threatened by breach of NZ Bill of Rights Act 1990 human rights including relating to search and seizure, surveillance, harassment) access to scheme independent specialist advocates, and state-trauma related rehabilitation and counselling.
3. Legislation facilitating the reconnection of young urbanised Māori to their tribe and their land and participation in indigenous trade and commerce

Comment: There is systemic inability for Māori and other vulnerable groups such as Pasifika and ethnic groups such as Muslims, to access systemic mechanisms that both prevent, raise awareness of, and heal, state-trauma — including undue or unwanted harassment by either individuals or institutions of the state. It will be impossible for the UPR to know to be provided an accurate state of human rights amongst such groups and such issues in New Zealand, until there is a much wider access to community advocates. Lawyers are out of reach of most people, and are often untrained¹ in the critical cultural and other issues affecting many whānau.

¹ A rare professional training on Tikanga Maori will be offered later this year thanks to the creativity of a young team of Māori professionals.

Appendix 2 — About submitting CSOs

JustCommunity

JustCommunity combines its experience of many years of legal practice in particular in South Auckland courts and tribunals and before the NZ Parole Board, with community advocacy rooted amongst communities affected by these areas. We work primarily in the courts and parole system of New Zealand but also work with reform and rehabilitation organisations, as well as community groups and whānau.

JustCommunity is generally assisted from law students, including from the Centre for Human Rights Law and Policy at the University of Auckland.

The criminal law practice of JustCommunity has benefited from hundreds of cases undertaken by lawyers at the Auckland Defence Chambers, as well as colleagues of the Criminal Bar of New Zealand, across all courts of New Zealand, as well as tribunals and the NZ Parole Board.

JustCommunity also facilitates meetings between international human rights lawyers and local Māori lawyers and human rights advocates, and also facilitates local human rights based community education. JustCommunity Founder and Director facilitated the 2016 Parihaka Conference, the first of its kind in central Tamaki Makaurau (Auckland). JustCommunity relies, ultimately, on the sense of humanity and right to access justice, within its team and community.
